

Muntari hangs up boots

• I'm tired, he says

Story: Bernard Neequaye

FORMER Ghana international, Sulley Ali Muntari, has dropped the strongest hint yet that he has called time on his playing career but only left a small window of a possible return to domestic football if he feels motivated and

fit to play again

Muntari explained that he was not interested in playing football anymore after his tenure with Accra Hearts of Oak ended last season. He said he was tired after a successful club career that started with Liberty Professionals and took him to the Italian Serie A,

English Premiership and the Spanish La Liga and the Saudi Arabian topflight league over the last 20 years.

Alejandro Garnacho

Talent extraordinaire

WHEN Manchester United paid Atletico Madrid £420,000 to capture Alejandro Garnacho from their youth side, they believed that he could soon blossom into a top star.

Two years down the line, the Spanish-born Argentine international is gradually living up to his price tag having helped Manchester United secure an emphatic victory over Sheriff Tiraspol in their Europa League game last Thursday.

The 18-year-old winger became the latest youngster to be handed a debut in the starting XI of their Europa league campaign.

He executed the role to perfection which has convinced his manager, Erik Ten Hag, the player has what it takes to become a first team player.

His European debut wasn't as emotional as his debut for the club at the age of 17, when his family were seen wiping away tears as he made cameo against Chelsea.

Garnacho is on a contract of £1,500 per week with Manchester United but based on his performance, it is believed that his managers would now push for an enhanced deal before his contract expires in 2025.
